MR. GARFIELD IN KANSAS.

James R. Garfield, commissioner of corporations is in Kansas to begin his investigation of the Standard Oil monopoly. It will not do to build any great hopes on Mr. Garfield's inquiry. The public has not yet forgotten that Mr. Garfield's investigation of the meat trust was entirely barren of real results. In the face of known facts his report made the meat trust a paragon of virtue and the same results is not unlikely in the Standard Oil matter.

It is most unfortunate that the inquiry is to be a secret one, as was the case in the meat trust fiasco. In defense of this plan Mr. Garfield says it would never do to have an open inquiry because "if formal open hearings were held and prosecutions followed, the person prosecuted would be in possession of all the information of the government, so it is necessary to keep the investigation secret." Much as we dislike to disagree with the commissioner we are nevertheless compelled to do so.

If there were the slightest danger that the oil trust officials would run away from the country in order to keep out of jail, there might be some sense in a secret inquiry. But they are not going to run away. They may be depended to make the hardest kind of a fight. This being the case, the publicity of the hearings could not make a slightest difference. Evidence for the prosecution does not become evidence for the defense because it is made public. Publications of the proceedings will reach anyway only the people who would otherwise have no means of knowing what is going on, and the Standard Oil company is not included in this list.

Surely Mr. Garfield is not trustful enough to believe that he can keep from the oil trust people any part of any testimony that may be adduced against them. They, with their millions and their tremendous influence, may be depended upon to find plenty of leaks. They will know who testifies and they will know the nature of the testimony before the stenographers have finished transcribing their notes.

The advantage of a public hearing would be that the public would be kept fully conversant with the proceedings. A public hearing would remove any suspicion that efforts were being made to protect instead of to prosecute the Standard Oil company. The money of the public is being used in the investigation and the public has a right to know how it is being used.

However, Mr. Garfield says that under the law the proceedings must be secret. And secret they will be.

The prints of Tonopah met Sunday evening in the Miner office and organized a Typographical Union. A committee was appointed to draw up bylaws and resolutions.
